[Microbiological and clinical studies on small bowel infection due to gram-negative bacteria: report of three cases]. Infectious small bowel diseases are very rare. We report 3 cases of small bowel infections due to Gram-negative bacteria: one neonate with sepsis and two adults with chronic diarrhea. The clinical presentation, bacteriological findings and treatment are discussed. Enteropathogenic Escherichia coli (ENTECC) and Vibrio parahaemolyticus are the most common pathogens. An early diagnosis is essential to start an adequate treatment and to avoid unnecessary surgery. The clinical presentation is characterized by diarrhea without fever, abdominal pain, or vomiting. Blood and stool cultures are often positive for ENTEC and V. parahaemolyticus. Definitive diagnosis is made by duodenal, jejunal or ileal biopsy. We recommend performing upper endoscopy and ileal biopsy. In case of enteritis due to V. parahaemolyticus, the results of rapid tests should be confirmed by more specific cultures. Antibiotics used for ENTEC are generally second-generation cephalosporins. For V. parahaemolyticus, the most effective treatment is the addition of metronidazole to a cephalosporin. For recurrent ENTEC and V. parahaemolyticus infections, we recommend immunization with the conjugated vaccine to prevent repeated infections. in the hippocampus is persistent and long lasting, this is the first study to demonstrate that T-tau levels change following traumatic brain injury. Our results showed a significant increase of T- 4bc0debe42
